Most victim service organizations provide a variety of resources such as brochures and websites for use by victims, colleagues, and community members. These resources should be designed to be accessible to the widest breadth of people, including victims and colleagues with disabilities. Whether materials are printed or available electronically, emphasizing the accessibility of these resources ensures that the most people possible can avail themselves of what these resources have to offer.

This handout reviews basic design and access considerations for print materials and provides visual examples of what works best and what doesn't work.
